Jum 61

ALETTER

TO

Gristin & W.

BRYAN EDWARDS, ESQUIRE,

CONTAINING

OBSERVATIONS

ON SOME PASSAGES OF HIS

HISTORY

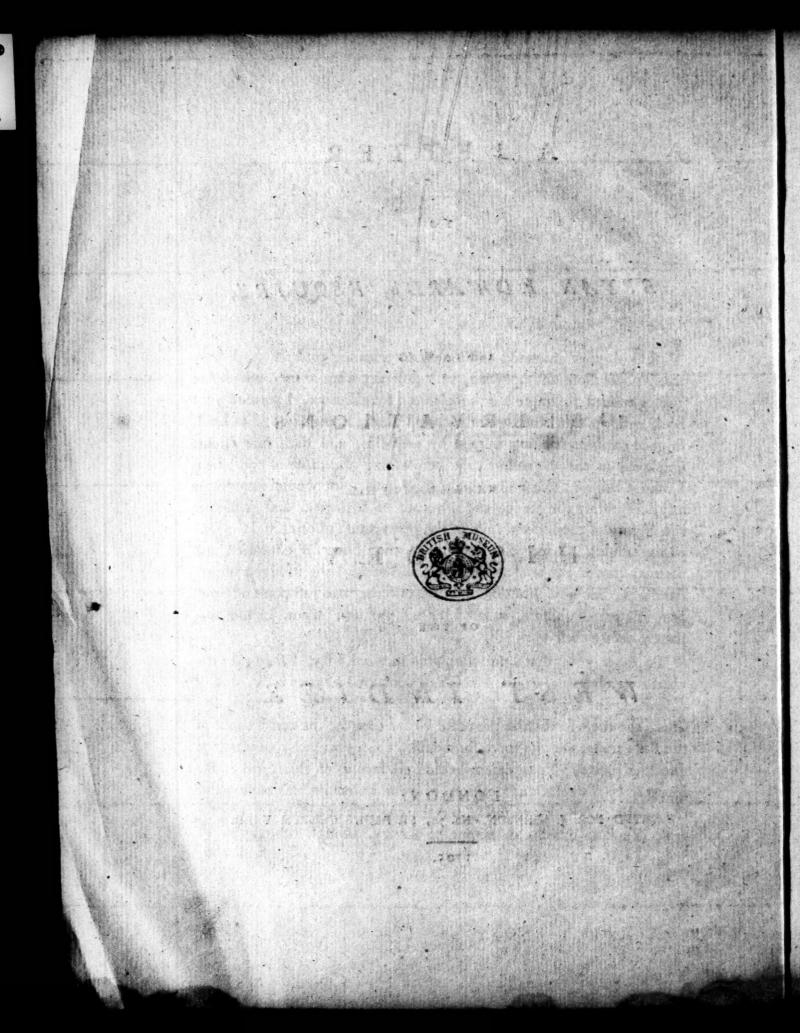

OF THE

WEST INDIES.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR J. JOHNSON, No. 72, ST. PAULE CHURCH-YARD.

¥795.

bene STR, Christo to silkelyneous streeting said, the chair on an act

ROM your animated and highly entertaining production, I drew many conclusions and opinions, very different from those, which the author wished to impress or inculcate. I must own, I perused your book with an equal mixture of pain and pleasure, perceiving, as I did, so good an understanding warped by prejudice, and such fine talents employed in the degrading task of pleading the cause of oppression. I cannot believe, that a liberal and ingenuous spirit would knowingly and deliberately commence the advocate of barbarity, and prostitute the dignity of the historic page to the propagation of error and the support of abuses. Your book is a strong proof how far education and use may harden the tenderest natures, and mislead the strongest understandings; and how incapable men are of seeing in a just point of view, or in it's proper colours, what is either too near them, or too constantly before their eyes.

has excited about the case of the beaution for a profession of the formation of the formation of the first of sour realisad; de americapas in de realism fouturant autobres acut in established.

• All all I enclarations have a moralism of a solution of the solution of the company of the solution of t established the second comment of the contract of the contract of the contract of Land the Applications and the first continues present and the second

To show you, that I am warranted in what I say, I shall take the liberty of adverting to some positions contained in your book, and of examining the arguments, on which they are sounded. You are, indeed, the most formidable advocate I have seen for the continuance of the slave trade, and the more formidable, from your not appearing the direct advocate. Your determination in savour of this cruel traffic seems to be the reluctant sacrifice, of your humanity and candour, to the resistless authority of sacts, and the cogent voice of truth and reason. Your arguments in savour of slavery, though strongly put in such as a such savour of slavery, though strongly put in such savour of slavery, though strongly put in such savour of slavery.

fubstance, yet, in form, are produced with a tone of moderation, and a feeming reluctance of hefitation and doubt, which, certainly, must give them greater weight with the reader.

Your conclusion in favour of a continuance of the flave trade feems to be grounded on the following confiderations.—That the flave trade is not a practice contrary to humanity, as we have been taught to think it, but perfectly reconcileable to philanthropy, and even conducing to the preservation of the human race.—The negroes are an inferior species of beings, gross in their intellects, and perverse in their dispositions; they are only to be governed by severity, and donot deserve to be considered or treated as men. But, supposing the traffic in human flesh as contrary to humanity and justice as we please, yet must it be continued; for, were it relinquished by Great Britain, the illands would lie uncultivated, for want of hands, and the exportation of flaves from Africa would not be diminished, but the profits of the flave trade would pass from us to other nations.

As to the first point, you seem persuaded, that a great part of the world is in an error respecting the slave trade; and that both those nations who have already abolished it, and the well meaning persons in the British dominions who are advocates for abolithing it, labour under a gross mistake, inasmuch as the continuance of flavery, and the traffic by which the stock of slaves is upheld, are perfectly reconcileable to humanity, and, instead of being, as they are commonly fupposed, destructive of the human species, materially conduce to it's preservation. You defend the general humanity of the treatment, which the negroes experience on their paffage from Africa to the West Indies from the captains and fupercargoes of flaves, previous to their being brought to market, and from their respective owners, after they become the property of planters; and you question, as wholly false, or highly exaggerated, the evidence which has been adduced of particular acts of barbarity. Il to moved at attract to the Allowing

Allowing what you say to be just, and, certainly, no man could have better opportunities of knowing the truth, and no man, I am certain, would be farther from an intention of disguising it:—yet, is it nothing to rend as under all the ties of nature? to outrage all the seelings of humanity? to tear the wife from her husband, the virgin from her lover? to deprive the tender and helpless infant of the care and attention of it's parents, and the aged and decrepid parents of the duty and support of their offspring? You admit yourself that sucide is frequent among the negroes. No very savourable symptom of their being treated with humanity.

You give a flattering picture of the condition of the slaves in the West Indies, and compare it with that of our peasantry at home. But, is the comparison fair?—The marked, distinguishing feature, the great effential difference, the inestimable blessing that endears every scene and recommends every condition, that fills the Laplander with enthuliastic love for his snowy wastes and his caverns-Freedom, is wanting. The pealant, if he chooses to sleep and fast, is not compelled to labour. If he finds one neighbourhood unpropitious, he may change it for another. The ftrange power of bome, as the poet terms it, sweetens his toil, and if his misfortunes and despondency should be such as to extinguish in his heart that strong and universal feeling, he can emigrate to some other land where brighter hopes allure him ; and amidst wretchedness, toil, and want, he is free from stripes and bonds, his person is sacred, he reposes in the shade of the constitution, the guardian power of the law is about his path, and about his bed, and he reflects, with pride, that he too, mean as he is, has a place and weight in the scale of civil existence.

Is nothing to be allowed for the feelings of the mind? Are the segrees such mere machines, indeed, that exemption from death and torture, and the necessary sustenance of animal duration are sufficient to their happiness? Are there not ingredients mixed in their cup sufficient to poison all enjoyment—dire necessity and stern compulsion?

pullion? Day succeeds to day, without hope of change, and brings to the miserable negro toll without respite, and sufferings without consolation.

You feem to think that the condition of the greater part of the negroes in the West Indies is not altered for the worse by their being fold into flavery in our colonies, inalmuch as most of them were flaves in their own country; it appearing in evidence, as you state, that there are many individuals in Africa, who possess large numbers of flaves, and occasionally drive a traffic in those poor creatures, who constitute a considerable part of their wealth. But, supposing this to be the fact, in their own country, flaves as they are, the negroes are furrounded by their wives, children, and near connexions; and when they come to the flave market, they are torn from all these. We know, too, that conditions, to which we have been accustomed. and evils, which we have long endured, appear more tolerable from habitude, and that new and untried fituations appear more dreadful from their novelty; and we may naturally conclude, that a negro will not deem servitude in his own country, to a person of his own tribe. hue, and religion, so dreadful, as flavery accompanied with banishment to a foreign land, where he becomes the property of a stranger. whose hue, whose language, religion, and manners, are all revolting alike to his feelings and apprehensions.

You allow, that no certain or precise account is easily to be obtained of the means by which the market for slaves is annually kept up and supported in Africa; the several instances that are given, arising from captivity in war, delinquency, and debt, justly appear to you inadequate to so great and abundant a supply; and, as you observe, it is difficult to imagine, that casual contributions of this kind can possibly furnish out an annual export of 74,000 persons.

Suppose, as you state, that there is among the African nations a

[.] Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

numerous class of people born only to the dismal inheritance of bonds and stripes; yet, are we to reject, as fabulous, the accounts of peaceful towns fired on, and the unoffending inhabitants made prisoners. by the crows of European thips, or of nations engaged in hostilities without provocation, and folely actuated by the defire of making flaves I Have not the bonds of fociety been loofed, and the ties of nature diffolded? Is not the hand of brother armed against his brother? Are not the hearts of parents steeled against their offspring. by the corrupting influence of a baneful traffic, and the contagious example of European avaries and European treachery? Indeed, you yourself seem to give up this part of the cause when you come to fpeak of "450,000 reasonable beings, (in the English islands only) " in a flate of barbarity and flavery, of whom, I will not fay the "major part, but-great numbers affuredly, have been torn from their native country and dearest connexions, by means which no good mind can reflect upon but with fentiments of difgust, commiferation and forrow "more it mon as wishing an almo went ; and

You feem to be perfuaded that the prospect of a flave market is a motive to elemency and a fource of mercy, while the warrior is induced to fave the life of his captive, and the magistrate to spare the criminal, by the prospect of that gain, which may accrue from a fale of their persons. Let it be granted, that many might be put to death who are now referved for the flave market-what is the amount and value of that mercy, which only exchanges an immediate, for a continued death, and referves the human victim to wring or crushout miserable existence, as it were, drop by drop, or atom by Consumos is nomaring and consumply Severe lentimots

- To proceed bothe treatment which the flaves experience in the English iflands, you give the following favourable representation of it + ties, and tours bind no founce or frang of adivity or motion; and

Herri 🚄

"Moderate labour, unaccompanied with the wrotched attained " which the poor in English are subject in heating providen for the day that is passing over them, live that be comparative fell "Men in lavage life have no incomive to emobiled, perfusion is lot on fuch men, and compultion; to a bestain degree, is burnarity in charity."-I cannot agree with you, that in fivage life men ha mo intentive to emulation v all history and especience there the trary. The thirst of falms and define of superiority reign in favor with more firength; perhaps, then in polithed foreig; the motives of action are lefs varied in form, and left uniform in operation; but their temporary and interrupted impulie, when it does aft, is more onergetico etheiri ellieft more inflantanebud and rapido Two of lab firmgelt emotions, that agitain the human bofom, and, of courie, two of the most powerful fournes be action, prevail particularly in faunce life the love of freedom, and the defire of vengence. Your express fion is inaccurate you, manifeltly, confound fenge life and florib life; they differ as widely as north from fouth The lavage date is natural to many and the gerin or parent of all civil fociety; the state is unpatural to many the corruption and disease of civil society. the fungous excrescence of avarice and luxury. The favilb state is without incentives to emulation; and why? because it is hopeless. It is without motives of aftion's and maky it because it degrades the risture of many and behumbs his faculties. If the sample flate leaves no incentives to emulation, no motives of action, it is manifely unnatural to man, and subversive of the designs of his Creater, who implanted in him passions and saculties susceptible of both.

COMPULSION is HUMANITY and CHARITY! Severe sentence! What must be the finte that justifies it? The baneful despending influence of flavery degrades the human electure, catinguistes his faculties, and leaves him no source or spring of activity or motion; and then, by a reflex act, slavery endeavours to countered the torpitude itself has induced, to restore the activity and vigour itself has destroyed; and substitutes cruelty and compulsion for the incentives of emulation, and legitimate motives of exertion.

Compulsion to a certain degree is humanity and charity!—Behold the bleffed effects of that humanity and charity—a yearly confumption of 38,000 of the human species in the English islands alone! It is observed by a sensible writer, that the slaves in the West India islands are the only class of beings that do not increase their numbers; and why! Through the bleffed influence of that compulsive humanity and charity. Here is an acknowledged fact, from which an inevitable conclusion arises stronger than a thousand witnesses, and in contradiction to all the flattering pictures of the condition of slavery.

Let us examine the humanity and charity of the flave trade a little more minutely. We will begin at the African flave market. How are the aged, the infant, and the female, the fickly and the feeble, fitted to endure the horrors of a voyage on board a flave ship? Would it not be better to be put to death at once, as you infinuate is the fate of fuch flaves as are rejected by the buyers, than to perish by the lingering mifery that awaits them in the poffession of Europeans? I do not mean to repeat what has appeared in evidence respecting the sufferings of the aegrees, on board flave thips; I wish to take every fact on your own fratement. You allow that the negroes, in general, are strongly attached to their countrymen +, that they have a fond affection for their native foil, infomuch, that, in absence, they look on death with transport, as the welcome instrument of their return. What then must be the fenfations of those UNFORTUNATES, torn from their countrymen and their native land, loaded with chains, and violently borne far distant, without the chance or hope of again beholding objects so justly dear? Wherever you speak of the negroes, I am forry to observe that you feem to speak of them as mere animals, and do not admit the feelings of the mind as forming any part of your estimate of their fufferings. You detail particularly the treatment of the negrees on board the flave ships—they are nourished with wholesome food, occasionally exhilarated with drams, furnished with pipes and tobacco, if they choose them, and invited to amuse themselves with the dance and song. The frequent attempts to regain their liberty, and the many instances of felf-destruction among the negroes, during the passage from Africa to the West Indies, show that they are not as sensible as might be expected of all the comforts and agreemens of this fituation. Partnership of fufferings and mutuality of forrows prove the basis of the dearest attachment and firmest connexion. New terms of relationship are devised, new ties of fondness are formed between the oppress and the miserable, the helpless, and the hopeless; while human nature expands itself to grasp at comfort, and embraces objects of affection and attachment, even in the bosom of milery and despair. We may conceive what must be the feelings of these unfortunates, and how great must be the sufferings and the forrows of their dreadful voyage, on board a flave ship, from the deep and melancholy impression which feems to remain on their minds, and the new and fond attachments which arise on the passage. You state that the term SHIPMATE is understood among the negroes + as fignifying a relationship of the most endearing nature; " perhaps, as recalling the time when the fuf-" ferers were cut off together from their common country and kindred." " and awakening reciprocal fympathy from the remembrance of mu-" tual affliction."

Chilley 22

See Christie on the French Revolution

⁺ Vol. II. Hift. of the West Indies.

I must add to this, that the slave market yearly occasions the destruction of a number of miserable victims, for whom no purchasers are

+ Vol. L. H.R. of the

^{*} It is admitted on all hands, that the men flaves are secured in irons when they first come on board: the mode is by fastening every two men together, the right ancle of one being fastened by means of a small iron fetter to the left of the other. Hist, of the West Indies, Vol. II. † Hist, of the West Indies, Vol. II.

found. I take the fact on your own statement *.—" The slave mer"chant, not having it in his power to maintain his captives for any "length of time, avows his intention of destroying them, if not sold
"by a certain day; and the work of death is sometimes performed "within sight of the English ships." Many of the slaves are brought to market, from remote regions, by needy and rapacious persons, neither able nor willing to maintain them for any length of time; murder, therefore, is the consequence of any delay, which not only deprives their owners of the prospect of immediate profit, but subjects them to an expense which they are ill able to sustain. At whose door is the guilt of this to be laid? Surely of the Europeans who frequent the market, and incite the natives to this criminal commerce.

I will allow, with you, that the stories of excessive whipping and barbarous mutilation are much exaggerated, both as to frequency and atrocity 4. It may even be true, that inflances of cruelty (by which I take it for granted, you mean excessive cruelty extending to life and limb) are not only rare, but universally reprobated, when discovered, and even punished when capable of legal proof. From the very nature of flavery such instances must frequently pass undiscovered, and will feldom, very feldom indeed, be capable of legal proof. Taking facts on your statement, and as they appear through your softened colouring, I cannot think, that any unprejudiced person will be persuaded, that the general treatment of the flaves is mild, temperate, and indulgent. The legislature, it is true, has interfered to foften the horrors of their condition; but you allow, that it has been impossible, to carry into effect some of its best provisions-that, for instance, that in the fale of flaves care shall be taken not to separate the different branches of the same family.

Take the segre on his landing.—You confess there is something extremely shocking in "beholding a numerous body of unfortunate

* Hist. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

+ Ibid

fellow creatures in captivity and exile, exposed naked to public view, and fold like a herd of cattle. Yet I could not observe fray you), that the negroes themselves were oppressed with many of " those painful fensations, which a person unaccustomed to the scene "would naturally attribute to such apparent wretchedness."-If they are men, they must feel it .- It is not very easy for the curfory, perhaps the prejudiced spectator, interested to apologize to his own heart for the share he takes in what is passing, and unacquainted, (as he is, with the language and the manners of the negroes, it is not easy for him to difcern, what is passing within their bosoms. The seeming unconcern of these unhappy beings may be variously accounted for.- It may be the frantic paroxysin of despair, looking to death, as a prompt relief from anguish. It may be the determined effort of a hardy and feroclous courage, prepared alike to fuffer and to dare; which, collected within itself, takes a pride in showing its contempt of pain and affliction. - But most probably the cause is different from both these motives, and this conduct may result from fear, or prudencedding po red a bantimue nevo bus

The negro, before he is long in the possession of Europeant, learns, from the severity of his condition, to repress his emotions, and disguise his seelings. The dejection of sorrow is imputed to him as sullenness. His tears are criminal, and his complaints perhaps expose him to punishment. This being the case, it requires no extraordinary sagacity in him to perceive, that it is necessary for him to conform to his situation, and that, were he to show any extraordinary sensibility, he would be regarded with a jealous eye, as a mutinous and disaffected slave, who would seize the first opportunity to effect his escape.

Some of the arguments, which you employ, to defend a continuance of the importation of negroes, are strong, to convince me, that the condition of the slave must be truly wretched.—The plantations, you state, are all understocked. How then must the miserable negro be overlaboured! The farms are understocked—yet there is a yearly importation of about forty thousand negroes to the British islands alone!—What then must be the annual consumption of the human species in this small portion of the inhabited globe? "It is com"puted," says Mr. Hume, "that a stock of slaves grows worse sive per cent, every year, unless new slaves be bought to recruit them?."

The words of that discerning and philosophic writer are very strong on this subject. "The practice of slavery being so common in antiquity, must have been destructive, to a degree, which no expect diest could repair. All I pretend to infer from these reasonings, is, that slavery is in general disadvantageous both to the happiness and the populousness of mankind+." And the universal prevalence of slavery is one of the chief arguments adduced, by this prosound observer, in order to combat the supposed populousness of ancient nations.

It was the practice of the ancients, with very few exceptions, to discourage and prevent, as much as possible, the propagation of the species among their slaves. Hame evinces this by various quotations from the classics. The same maxims of policy or economy prevail amongst the proprietors of slaves in the British islands, and on similar principles.

"The comparison is shocking between the management of human creatures, and that of cattle; but being extremely just, when applied to the present subject, it may be proper to trace the confequences of it. At the capital, near all great cities, in all rich populous industrious provinces, sew cattle are bred. Provisions, lodging, attendance, labour, are there dear, and men find better their account in buying the cattle, after they come to a certain.

[·] Esfays, Vol. I. Esfay II. p. 422.

Il de f . istina 10 11 . . . Ibid. p. 428.

age, from the remoter and cheaper counties. These are, conse-" quently, the only breeding countries for cattle; and by a parity of " reason, for men too, when the latter are put upon the same foot-" ing with the former. To rear a child in London till he could be " ferviceable, would cost much dearer, than to buy one, of the same " age, from Scotland or Ireland, where he had been raised in a cottage, covered with rags, and fed on oatmeal and potatoes. Those who " had flaves, therefore, in all the richer and more populous coun-" tries, would discourage the pregnancy of the females, and either " prevent or destroy the birth; the human species would perith in " those places where it ought to increase the fastest; and a perpe-" tual recruit be needed, from all the poorer, and more defert pro-" vinces. Such a continued drain would tend mightily, to depopulate " the state, and render great cities ten times more destructive than 46 with us, where every man is mafter of himfelf, and provides for 46 his children, from the powerful instinct of nature, not the calcula-" tions of fordid interest ."

These restections surnish a key, that enables us to comprehend how it happens, that there is so great an annual demand for slaves in the West India islands. A stock of slaves is considered in the same light as a stock of cattle; the principles of rural economy, and the calculations of loss and gain, are more considered, and have greater influence, with respect to them, than the precepts of morality, and the principles of christianity. The planters reason thus with themselves—Provisions, clothing, lodging, attendance, labour—all are dear. We may purchase an adult slave, fit for labour, for a less sum than it would cost to rear him.—You yourself state +, that there is an annual diminution of the number of slaves; which must be the case, since, as you say, notwithstanding the yearly recruit by importation, the farms are still understocked; and you consess, that it must be frankly admitted, that flavery, in its mildest form, is unfriendly to population. Hence you draw an argument against the abolition of the slave trade; but, in my mind, this consideration, if duly weighed, furnishes an unanswerable plea against its continuance. What must be that condition of life, if life it may be called, which counteracts all the propensities of nature, all the genial influence of a warm and benignant climate!

^{*} Hume's Effays, Vol. I. p. 420.

⁺ Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

You will feek to account for this lamentable waste of the human species, this tremendous and incessant depopulation amongst the unhappy negroes, from causes independent of excessive labour or severe treatment.—Not a third of the flaves imported are women, as appears by your statement. Whether this proceeds from choice or necessity, I know not; war and delinquency, as you observe, find fewer victims among the fofter kind; and on this principle you would account for the redundancy of males. But war and delinquency, on your own statement, furnish but a small proportion of the slaves. which come to market. We must account for this fact, then, in fome other way. The affortment of any vendible thing brought to market will be always determined by the wishes and demands of the buyers. The greatest possible quantity of immediate labour, not the increase of his breed of slaves, will be the object of the planter; of course, he will seek adult males in the market , to the exclusion of women and children; at least, he will give a decided preference to the former. The direct contrary of this must happen at a Circassian slave market, and for an obvious reason. Hence it appears why (independent of other reasons) a smaller number of semale negroes are purchased by the slave buyers. And as the more susceptible minds and feebler frames of women must render them more sensible of the horrors of their condition, and less able to encounter the hardships and misery of a voyage on board a slave ship, a larger proportion of the weaker sex will perish during the passage.

[•] It is shocking, as Mr. Hame observes, to be obliged to speak thus of the human species. But such are the language and principles of the slave trade.

From this statement it follows, that two thirds of the negro men must be doomed to celibacy, in addition to all their other miseries. The conjugal union sweetens all the enjoyments, and alleviates all the bitterness of life; but it is peculiarly necessary to render the condition of the poor tolerable, and to prevent gross licentiousness and debauchery among the mean and uneducated. A partner in labour—a confidente in sorrow—a nurse in sickness—who but a wife will adhere to the indigent and outcast? I must consider this solitary doom of a great majority of the negroes as among the prime severities of their sate.

This great redundancy of males among the megro flaves does not operate only to prevent the men, who are deprived of female partners, from continuing their species, but is a fatal impediment to the fertility of the women. "The consequence of the redundancy of males," say you *, " is shocking licentiousness and profligacy; among the women (who are exposed to temptations which they cannot resist) barrenness, frequent abortion, and want of mater"nal tenderness to their children."

The number of negro flaves in the West India islands belonging to the English may, on a rough calculation, be half a million to The fe-

* Vol. II.
† The number of negroes in the British West Indies are stated to be as follows:
In Jamaica about item and the management of the state of Barbadoes 63,000
Grenada
St. Vincent
Dominica 132 13.000
St. Christopher
Antigua 1, 37,868
Montlerrat, &c
C. Tro co Tr of the control of the c
See Hist. of the West Indies, Vol. I. under the heads of the respective islands.

males make only one third of the whole number of negroes imported. A promiscuous intercourse with the other sex prevents many of the women from becoming breeders. Suppose, on these accounts, that only one tenth of the negro slaves are women that continue the breed—there are fifty thousand females; a sufficient number, surely, to maintain the stock of slaves, without resorting to importation, were marriages encouraged among those poor people; were any pains taken to correct their licentiousness, and maintain regularity of manners among them; and any reasonable attention bestowed on the preservation of their offspring. But the melancholy truth is, that while, as I said before, a full grown negro can be purchased at less cost than he can be reared, very sew negro infants (comparatively speaking) will be born, and of those sew a small portion, indeed, will attain to maturity.

In the usual course of population, the number of births is to the whole number of the inhabitants of any country as one to thirty-five. Under the peculiar circumstances of the negroes, the births must bear a yet smaller proportion to the whole number. Let us suppose them to be as one to fifty, there will be ten thousand births; which added to the number of negroes imported, give a yearly accession of fifty thousand to the existing stock of slaves; and yet, it appears that their number, instead of daily increasing, as one might expect, is rather on the decline; and the farms are understocked. How this happens, it is not difficult to conceive. I shall not make the reslections on this statement that the subject naturally suggests; but, surely, it is worthy the consideration of an enlightened nation, that values itself on its humanity, to try whether this enormous prodigality of rational existence may not be avoided, or at least retrenched.

As a sample of the cruel and injudicious manner in which the unfortunate negroes are treated, and of the little attention which is paid to their health, their preservation, or their wants, I shall advert to a fact.

fact, which is stated in your book. The negroes are subject to a certain malady called mal d'estimac, or the stomach evil; they become dropsical, and complain of a constant uncasiness in the sumach, for which they find a temporary relief in eating some kind of earths. "I have beard of owners and managers so savage and ignorant to at tempt the cure by severe punishments, considering dirt-eating, not as a malady, but a crime. (You hope) that this race of tyrants is extinct," but you do not speak, as if such were the case.

I shall not multiply instances of cruelty and brutality, or enlarge on the spectacle of human creatures driven to their talk with the scourge, worn out and fainting, under continued and excessive toil; these subjects have been sufficiently detailed by preceding writers. I proceed to another circumstance of wretchedness in the condition of the unhappy negroes.—No care is taken to instruct them in the principles of morality, or to lead them, by the mild and patient arts of perfusion, to a knowledge of the CHRISTIAN RE-LIGION. Nothing of this kind has been attempted, generally or in a legislative manner: and as to the endeavours of a few well-meaning and pious christians, they are too inconsiderable, and too confined in their operation, to form an exception to the position +. If, instead of treating the negroes as brute beafts, with respect both to their bodies and their minds, some pains were employed in civilizing and instructing them, the same degree of labour, which is now extorted from fullen and reluctant dispondency, by the terrors of punishment, would be most cheerfully performed from a fense of duty. The Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

† Number of converted negroes in Antigua

St. Kitts

Barbadoes, and Jamaica

St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. Jan

10,000

Surinam

Yet I would by no means be thought to undervalue the pious labours of the society for advancing christian knowledge, fude minds of the flaves would be referred from the terrific and domineering influence of forcerers and necromancers, and the belief in spells and incantations, which, as you state, make such deplorable ravages among them. Believe me, the progress of knowledge, and the propagation of christianity, would be more effectual, than a thousand sanguinary statutes, to deliver the negroes from the destructive consequences of Obeab practice *.

Tude

You yourself seem to feel the disregard of religion and morality. which appears in the management of the negroes; and with respect to one particular circumstance, the neglect of the fabbath, you exprefs yourfelf in a manner, which does honour to your heart.-" A third measure has been recommended, of less doubtful efficacy: " it is, to render the fabbath, what it ought to be, a day of reft and " religious improvement; to which end, the markets of Sundays " ought to be supprest. THEY ARE A DISGRACE TO A CHRISTIAN " COUNTRY. And if a market is found absolutely necessary to en-" courage the negroes in labouring for themselves, some other day, " once a fortnight, may be appropriated for the purpose +." But, notwithstanding your eulogium on the mild and humane treatment. which the flaves experience, it appears by your own confession, that so far from the prevalence of a merciful and humane spirit, such is the unrelenting avarice, and fuch the cruel short-fighted policy of the planters, that this alteration, though pointed out by morality and religion, and even suggested by prudence, is objected to, and would be univerfally opposed, as depriving the owners of twenty-fix days labour in the year of the whole community 1.

I come now to what you allow to be a cruel hardship in the

See an account of Obeah practice, and the ravage it makes among the flaves. Edw. Vol. II.

Obeah practice is made felony of death;

⁺ See Edwards's Hift. Vol. II. 1 Vol. II.

condition of the negroes, their liability to be fold by creditors, and made subject, in a course of administration by executors, to payment of all debts, both of fimple contract and specialty; you describe the mifery confequent on this regulation, in such pathetic terms, that I shall transcribe the passage *. " In a few years a good negro gets " comfortably established, has built himself a house, obtained a wife. " and begins to see a young family rising about him. His provision " ground, the creation of his own industry, affords him, not only " fupport, but the means of adding fomething to the mere necessaries " of life. In this fituation he is feized on by the fheriff's officer. " forceably separated from his wife and children, dragged to public " auction, purchased by a stranger, and perhaps sent to end his " miserable existence in the mines of Mexico, secluded from the light " of heaven; and all this, without any crime or demerit on his part, " real or pretended. He is punished because his master is unfortu-" nate. I do not believe, that any case of force or fraud in Africa " can be productive of greater mifery; neither can it be urged, " that, like some unauthorized cases of cruelty in the West Indies, " it happens but feldom: unhappily, it occurs every day; and " under the present system, will continue to occur. This griev-" ance, so remorfeless and tyrannical in its principle, and so dread-" ful in its effects, though not originally created, is now upheld " and confirmed, by a British act of Parliament, procured by, and " passed for the benefit of British creditors. And I blush to add; " that its motives and origin have fanctified the measure even in " the opinion of men, who are among the loudest declaimers against " flavery, and the flave trade. Thus the odious feverity of the "Roman law, which declared fentient beings to be inter res, is " revived and perpetuated in a country that pretends to chris-" tianity."-Your indignation is just; your sentiments are liberal and pious; but I am forry to find so much inconsistency in the compais of a few pages.—How can I reconcile the foregoing extract with your affertions, that the negroes are treated with mildness and humanity? or with your urgent pleas for the necessary of continuing the slave trade? Is it not a necessary condition of slavery, that the slave must be inter res, as much a vendible chattle as a horse or an ox?

You reprobate the English statute in question; but this statute is a necessary consequence of the existence of flavery. It is not introductory of any new law, or creative of any new rights, but merely explanatory of the old. While flaves continue to be fuch, the maxims and principles of the law must embrace them, and operate uponthem according to their condition. As long as men continue to be as much goods and chattles as a herd of cattle, or household furniture, they must be subject to all the maxims, rules, and regulations, that govern the poffession, or the transfer of moveable property. It would certainly be gross injustice toward the planters, as well as a great hardship on them, if they should be debarred from felling what they are allowed to buy. You very justly observe, " that the state of the negro should not be left to the capricious mercy, or vari-44 able temperament, of any man, but placed on a footing of perma-" nent and known fecurity, to bring with it content; or else the " flave must be exposed to all the horrors of fear and uncertainty-" this hour, the property of a merciful and benignant owner; the next, liable, by his death or infolvency, to be fold to a brute and " a tyrant." - Strange, that you should not perceive, that the certainty of evil, and uncertainty of all good, are fuch necessary and inseparable confequences, indeed, fo much the very effence of flavery, that it is impossible to engraft on that condition any change or regulation, that will bring to the miserable bondman any permanent or knownaccusity. In obtaining that he must cease to be a slave.

Whether

Whether ten hours in twenty-four, during which the flaves are compelled by the terrors of the feourge to toil, without remission, infultry relaxing climate, be a reafousble and moderate period or not, and whother such a measure of toil, daily continued, must not ultim exhaust the strength long before it's natural decline, and considerably thorten the existence of a human creature, is more than I can presume to calculate. But I fee plainly, that no attempt is made to afcertain what humanity may reasonably demand, and a well-disposed slave freely perform; no regulation is adopted, which might vary the talk whether as to exertion or duration, according to the natural frength of the individual, or the occasional influence of indisposition, which, without confining the wretch to the bed of fickness, may incapacitate him for labour, both by depression of spirit and diminution of museular force. The overfeer's whip knows no discretion, and often does it's operation on the fainting victim convert a flight and curable malady into an incurable and mortal disease. The only apportionment of toil to strength, or distinction of ability to labour, is what results from the general division of the negroes into three classes grown men women and boys and children a classification much too general for the purposes of humanity in the equitable distribution of toil. According to this comprehensive division, there is one common measure of labour for all the individuals in a class; and we may presume, that the standard of imputed strength, by which all are tasked to work, is not taken from the weakest among them. You yourself seem to feel the cruelty and injustice of this indiscriminate exaction of labour, this inhuman difregard to the physical powers of the unfortunate indivi-You yourfelf feem to acknowledge, that, in order to render the condition of the negroes tolerable, labour should be rendered certain and determinate, and the talk should be proportioned to the strength of the labourer; but, at the same time, you frankly confess, that you think any regulation for this purpole impracticable. Undoubtedly it is while flavery continues; the owner having purchased an absolute dominion over the person of his flave, a dominion guaranteed by the of his country, in every thing thort of life and limb, confiders inself as invested with a right to dispose of his time and labour, and affign him employment, uncontrolled by any thing but his own difcretion or humanity; this right he justly supposes to be inseparable from the enjoyment of his fervice, and would exclaim loudly against any attempt to abridge or regulate it by law, as an infringement of his property. Such a regulation would, in fact, afford no seal protection or benefit to the flave, and would involve his owner in daily and insuperable difficulties. It would engage the negro in fruitless refistance and contention with his mafter, it would diffuse a spirit of discontent and disobedience, and would make every day's talk a fource of litigation before the magistrate. It is freedom alone, excited by the hopes of gain, that finds in the voluntary exertions of industry the maximum of what the Brength and faculties of the human creature can perform.

To recapitulate, in a few words, your flatement of the fituation of the segross in the British illands—They are torn (many of them by force or fraud) from their native land, their homes, their friends, and connexions; they are borne in fetters, without prospect of return, to a foreign country, endure great miseries during the voyage, and are fold like cattle on their arrival; they are driven to their daily labour with the scourge, and no care is taken to proportion the measure of the task to the degree of strength; their minds are neglected as much as their persons are coerced; they are, for the most part, debarred of that happiness which results from a virtuous union of the fexes; their situation for good or ill is wholly precarious, depending on the temper and disposition of their owner; and if any drop of consert should chance to be mingled in their cup of affliction, it is liable every moment to be dashed from their lips, while gall unmixed is substituted in its place by the death or insolvency of a kind and merciful master, and the being suddenly transferred to a brutal unrelenting tyrant; and as an unanswerable proof of the misery of the wretched slaves, we find that their condition is such as to counteract the strongest natural propensities; and that, notwithstanding a very great yearly importation of negroes, their number, instead of increasing, is rather on the decline.

You allow the fact of this diminution in the population of the negrees in the British islands, but you affert, that human nature must be in very favourable circumstances to increase it's numbers. The direct contrary of this is the truth; it requires some uncommon circumstances of misery and hardship, some very extraordinary exertion of cruel and unnatural policy, to counteract the genial principle, and prevent the increase of human nature.

The Yews multiplied under the Egyptian bondage, the Spartan helots multiplied, the British vitleins multiplied, the northern serfs multiply; no very favourable fituations theirs, but wretched, on the contrary, in an extreme degree. " In the ordinary course of things, "human nature exerts its powers to multiply itself in an astonishing manner. In every state, the population of which does not increase, " or increases flowly, and is not proportioned to the natural fecundity " of the species, you may justly affirm, that there is some defect, as ff great as the difference, between the actual population as it is, and " that which it ought to be, had not the operation of this depopu-" lating cause taken place +." It follows, that the slavery of the negroes is more cruel and more destructive in its influence, than that of the Jews or helots of old; of the ancient English villein, or of the peafant in Poland or Muscovy at this day. The state of marriage is so attractive, that, unless there is an absolute impossibility of supplying the wants to which it gives birth, every citizen finds himself naturally drawn to it; the human heart, formed with benevolent fympathies and social passions, seels a dreary void within, and languishes for an object of permanent attachment: what shall we say then of the heart-less and unrelenting regimen, that directly proscribes all the best propensities and kindest dispositions in the heart of man?

[·] See Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II,

[†] See Encyclopédie, mot Population.

But the negroes, it should seem, from your account of them, are inferior beings; they are dull and intractable. You dwell on their fupposed inferior nature and blameable propensities, their slowness of apprehenfion, their loquacity and disposition to thieving and lying, as a justification of the severities exercised on them, and a pretence for retaining them in flavery. All this, I must own, is rather infinuated, than directly afferted by you; but I think it is fair to conclude from your manner of speaking, that you are persuaded, and would persuade your readers, that were freedom bestowed on the negroes in our islands, their intellectual powers are so confined, and their habits of life and manners so depraved and vitiated, that they would be incapable of making the right use of the vast bleffing. A latent self-love is apt to infect and colour the reasonings, not only of the vulgar, but even of the enlightened and philosophic mind. By this internal flatterer we are infentibly led to take our flandard of excellence from our own qualities both natural and acquired; and to view, with diflike and contempt, those who materially differ from us in either; nay, to consider human creatures in fuch a predicament, as a race of beings inferior to ourselves. On such a mistaken principle has the learned and liberal professor Robertson endeavoured to justify the unprovoked aggression of the Europeans in the conquest of the new world, and to palliate, if not defend, the cruelties committed by them in the profecution of their defign.

It is well known that oppression and severe treatment will degrade the nature and embrute the faculties. The agonizing reveries of hopeless forrow and wild distraction, or the fullen insensibility of deep despair, reckless of the future, may appear stupidity to the undistinguishing eye and unrelenting mind of the planter. It is not easy to appreciate the talents, or the moral qualities, whether good or ill, of people with whose language and manners we have little or no acquaintance, and whom, besides, we despise too much to bestow on them the degree of attention requifite for making the estimate. A prejudiced or superficial observer will impute many things to the negro as instances of depravity or want of capacity, that are, in truth, only the inevitable refult of the difference of manners and religious inflitutes of the less improved state of society, or of the imperfect progress of arts and manufactures in their own country. Though you feem to be apprized of the difficulty of speaking of the characters and difpositions of the negroes, you allow that many of them possess estimable qualities; the Coromantins, in particular, are actuated by a high sense of honour, and an intrepid and daring courage, which, no doubt, are connected with other manly virtues. The profound veneration for old age*, and the fond attachment to hip-mates, or those who have been imported in the same vessel from Africa, are favourable traits in the character of these unfortunate people. "Slavery is certainly a situation "that necessarily suppresses many of the best affections of the human " heart; if it calls forth any latent virtues, they are those of sympa-"thy and compassion, towards persons in the same condition of " life.—Of the miserable people thus condemned to exile and servi-"tude, though born in various and widely separated countries, it is " not easy to discriminate the peculiar manners and native propensi-" ties. The fimilar and uniform system of life to which they are " all reduced; the few opportunities, and the little encouragement, "that are given them for mental improvement, are circumstances that " necessarily induce a predominant and prevailing cast of character

^{*} Neither is the regard thus displayed towards the aged confined to outward ceremonies and titles of respect. It is founded on active principles of native benevolence, furnishing one of the few exceptions to their general unrelenting and selfish character. Hist. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

" and disposition . The day (says Homer) that makes a man a slave " takes away half his value, and, in fact, he loses every impulse to " action, except that of fear +." I am apt to think that the observations which go in derogation of the moral or intellectual qualities of the negro, of his felfishness, cruelty, and revengeful disposition, are chiefly taken from a review of those who have been habituated to flavery, or born into that unhappy condition. The stupidity and incapacity of the negroes, and their vicious and depraved propenfities, may be made a pretext for retaining them in captivity, and treating them like brute beafts; but I must say, that it appears to me rather unjust and abfurd, to make the very blemishes and defects which the condition of flavery either creates or augments, the arguments for retaining those miserable creatures in a state so unfriendly to all goodness, and fo degrading to human nature. Slavery, make the best of it, debases the mind, and disfigures the human character. But what is the flavery of the negro? Compare his condition with that of a flave among the ancient Greeks and Romans: they educated their flaves with care; they taught them useful arts, and enlightened them with science; and, finally, they cheered and supported them in their bondage with the prospect of manumission.

You confess, with a candour that pervades your whole work, that you were once of opinion, "that it became this great and renowned "nation, instead of regulating her conduct by that of other states, to set a laudable example to them, by an immediate and unqualified fuppression of this reprobated commerce; and I should still maintain and avow the same sentiments (say you 1), were I not, on better information, led to suspect that the means proposed are not adequate

[•] The negroes when invested with command, give full play to their revengeful passions, and exercise all the wantonness of cruelty without restraint or remorfe. Their treatment of cattle under their direction is brutal beyond belief, &c. Hist. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

⁺ See Hift of the West Indies, Vol. II

to the end. I fear that a direct and fudden abolition of the flave " trade, by one nation only, will not ferve the purposes of humanity in Africa; and I am fully convinced that fuch a measure will tend " to aggravate, in a high degree, the mileries of a great majority of the negroes already in the West Indies, whose decreasing population " is at present unavoidable, and who therefore, unless recruited by " fupplies from Africa, may find their labours increase as their " numbers diminish." And why is the decreasing population of the negroes at present unavoidable?—Why-but from the unexampled mifery of their condition.-How long shall we offer human hecatombs to the cruel prejudices of avarice? What institutions are these that annually, like a devouring and infatiable gulf, demand the deftruction of fifty thousand helpless, unoffending human creatures? - What institutions are these that annually destroy by want, by toil, by sickness, by forrow, by torture, and every species of cruelty, a full tenth of the whole negro population of the British West Indies?-Humanity shudders as we read of the spectacles of gladiators among the Romans; we turn, with abhorrence, from the detail of the maffacres and cruelties of France: but what are these compared with the cold blooded rage of avarice, the fanguinary atrocity of law, that fanctions murder and calls it policy; that lavishes the germ of existence; that destroys the human species both root and branch; that perpetuates massacre and extermination from year to year, and from age to age, without hope or end, and calls it necessity!

But you doubt whether a discontinuance of the slave trade on the part of Great Britain, other nations continuing to purchase slaves as usual, would contribute to remedy the miseries of the unhappy negroes. I am asraid your reasonings on this head will not have much weight, except with those who wish to be satisfied by them. You say, that should the slave trade be abolished on our part, one or other of these consequences would follow—either the French, the Dwich, and other maritime nations of Europe, would avail themselves of the opportunity by seizing on what we surrender, and increase their trade in proportion to the increased supply. Or, having the choice and resulal of 38,000 slaves annually, more than they have at present, they will be harder to please, and only purchase prime slaves. The old, the very young, the sickly, and the seeble will be rejected on account of this redundancy in the market. "Behold, then, an excess of 38,000 of these miserable people thrown on the market." And you give us room to suppose that, not finding purchasers, they will either be put to death immediately, by their owners, or left to perish by famine.—And does a milder doom await those who do find purchasers?

Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

Let us examine this reasoning more minutely.—In the first place. Great Britain must continue the slave trade; for if she does not, it will pass into the hands of other nations to our detriment, and their emolument.—This topic fairly gives up the morality of the practice and the honour of the nation.—The practice, we grant, is iniquitous, and the cause of exquisite misery to multitudes of our fellow creatures; but why relinquish it in a fit of mistaken tenderness? Should we do so, the poor natives of Africa will not profit by our good intentions, fince, whether the buyers are many or few, the flave market will be equally supplied, and other maritime nations will profit by our squeamishness; and the same acts of oppression, violence, and fraud, which are faid to be committed by princes on their subjects, or by individuals on each other, for the purpose of procuring slaves for fale, will exist, as usual, without regulation or restraint. Some instances of these crimes may still exist; but will they be as numerous. and frequent? If you answer in the affirmative, you must maintain that crimes will be equally frequent, whether the incentive to commit them be great or small. I cannot suppose that the legislature would be so blind and inconsiderate as to prohibit the continuance of the slave trade by British subjects in British bottoms, while they left the importation of slaves to our colonies free and open for the ships of other nations.—No—I take it for granted, that not only the carrying of slaves in British vessels, but the future importation of them into our colonies by any means, must be understood to be prohibited, else the interference of the legislature would be nugatory. See then how the account stands on your statement.

Total nur	nber of flave	s annually	exported	from Africa	74,	000
Compet	raille til e ro				ology) in	100
Of these of	lifferent natio					000
•	. Applicate	mg Bliff	a diffu sid	Frenc		000
,50 mg/s - 3193	herrid -	Mullen ?	and build	Dutc	的形式和对方对方代数型的	000
10 ,000,000		* short a	ndi sili 4	Dane	经已经的股份的	000
10000	Laboration !	160 61 20	illa vali	Portu	guele 10,	000
au Baig i	all its state	up the let	Lavin All	in toda in	的一,是面侧	Hage()
. Administra	Editablish a	or lated the	i billionia	icha och b	a manual 3	000*

So that you see considerably more than one half of the whole export of slaves from Africa is made by the British alone, and that the British have been in the habit of exporting more slaves from Africa (whether for their own use or to supply other people) than all the remaining nations of Europe put together, when the demand of those nations for slaves was greatest. But we are to consider how the matter stands at present: the French and the Danes no longer import slaves, we are therefore to subduct 22,000 from the sum total above given. The residue is 52,000; of which the English export from Africa 38,000, that is to say, nearly three parts in sour of the whole amount +! Yet you contend that the slave market would continue the same as before, and the same cruel iniquitous means be used to supply it, though the demand for flaves would be diminished in the proportion of 38 to 14 by the abolition of that cruel commerce on the part of Britain.

[·] See Hift, of the West Indies, Vol. IL.

Your reasoning supposes the slave market governed by principles different from those that govern every other market in the world, and that the diminishing the number of buyers, or, in other words, the call for the commodity, would not diminish the quantity of the commodity brought to market. Demand and supply are commonly supposed to be reciprocal. The incentive to the bringing of any commodity to market is the price it bears, and the price is regulated by the demand. You yourself admit that the prices on the coast have been known to vary, as the market is more or less plentifully supplied *; and yet, in contradiction to this flatement of your own, you suppose the African flave merchant to stupid, and devoid of all observation and reflection, as not to know one of the most obvious truths, a truth forced on his mind by daily experience—that demand and supply grow up together, and continue to regulate and support each other. But these you fay " are the arrangements of well informed and civilized men." In my mind they are among the very first and most obvious principles of barter; and to be known, require no deep or philosophical research, but the simple existence of a commercial intercourse. I cannot, therefore, agree with you in your conclusion, that " fo long as any Eu-" ropean thips create a market, whether the price of flaves be high or " low, it can hardly be doubted that wars between nations for the " fole purpose of obtaining flaves, and all the other enormities con-" fequent from this abhorred commerce, will be as frequent as " ever t." I will grant you that the reduction of the number of flaves brought to market will not be inflantaneous, or, at first, in pro-

See Pal, of the West Called Vell IL

the waith a tropped in the widow and

[•] See Hift. of the West Indies, Vol. II.

[†] Ibid. Where the opinion of admiral Edwards, on this fubject, is quoted.

portion to the diminution of the member of language, but it will containly follow it, and gradually overtake it, to us in a floor time to be exactly proportionate to that diminution. You fitte that the flave market is partly supplied by prisoners taken in war, and criminals condemped to death or flavery by the civil magistrate; but you add, that the number of persons in these producements it very inadequate to an annual demand of 74,000 slaves, the remainder is made up by innocent victims dragged from the business of peaceful repose, and torn from their homes and descript connexious. Reduce the yearly exportation of slaves to 14,000, it is possible, may highly probable, that such a demand as that may be fully supplied by prisoners of war and offenders against the laws of their respective communities; and we should have the consolation of thinking, that none were doomed to exile and chains, but such as had commuted that destiny with a miserable death at the hand of their enemies; or such as had merited misfortune by their own misconduct and crimes.

But still you would persuade us that the voice of humanity pleads for a continuance of the slave trade. "Behold (say you) 38,000 of "those miserable people thrown on the market." And you give us room to suppose, that they would be either murdered by the African proprietors disappointed of purchasers, and weary of the trouble and charge of keeping them and maintaining them, or lest to perish miserably by sumine. If this should happen at all, which I must doubt, at least to the extent which you seem to apprehend, it could not happen more than once, for the desertion of the buyers would certainly and speedily occasion a contraction of the market by the absence of the fellers; whereas the destruction of the human species by the continuance of the slave trade must be hopeless and uninterrupted. As to the misseries which would result to the slaves already in the West Indies, from the circumstance of the farms being already understocked; I do not fee why they should follow as necessary consequences. Let the cultivation be contracted for a time; give the negro some respite; wait till the population fully unswers the demand of agriculture; this may cause a temporary loss to the planter, but he will be repaid tenfold. And what are temporary loss to the existence of myriads?

DOM:

I have been unawares betrayed into great prolixity, but your work is written with so much ability, and so highly recommended by the graces of composition, that it must universally command respect and attention; my folicitude to answer some passages that appeared to me to have a cruel tendency, and, at the fame time, to admit of an eafy answer even from so weak a reasoner as myself, has led me, I fear, into much unnecessary repetition. As I defigned an appeal to the candour of a feeling and enlightened mind, I have purposely declined all refort to any other source of information than what your book affords. You feem to deprecate the discussion of this subject as unwise and dangerous, and are apprehensive that the advocates for humanity trampled under foot in the person of the miserable negro, may cause the destruction both of him and his master, by ill-timed and injudicious efforts in a virtuous cause. You apprehend, that "by exciting among the flaves a fpirit of discontent and disobedience, they may " compel, in many cases, the benevolent man to withhold the hand " which otherwise would be stretched out for their relief; and thus, " by rendering their masters odious in their eyes, those unfortunate " people, apprized as they are, that they are held in a subjection which " is reprobated in the mother country, may be led to make a general " ftruggle for freedom, through defolation and blood "." This manner of reasoning, or rather of talking, would preclude all discussion, all examination of the fituation and fufferings of the segrees, from an apprehension that the investigation might, in the end, come to the knowledge of the poor victims who are the subject of it, and teach them to know and refent their grievances. As if they could not know, or in their hearts refent the calminities of their dreafful frontion, until they were fuggethed to them from England! Strings, indeed, if a segre fainting with Itall, term to pieces with themse and bleeding at every pure, is first taught by an English declaimer or writer of pamphlets to think himself a milerable treature, and to wish for deliverance.

This fort of argument would preclude the fair discussion, not only of this question, but of every question that involves the rights, the happiness, or the misery, of the mass of the people. If we are to prohibit free inquiry into the flate of any body of men, and interes every movement and every attempt towards the redress of their grievances and removal of their complaints (though it is confessed that they are unhappy), from an apprehension that the many, if their complaints should be attended to, and if any steps should be taken to remove or alleviate their miferies, might throw off all reftraint and anticipate redrefs by force and violence, all grievance, all miss all tyranny must be perpetual; and if they should be perpetual, it is not their nature to remain flationary; they increase and spread, they double and redouble, in a feries of progression far exceeding the geometrical. Untenable, indeed, is the doctrine, that farinks from a free examination. Unstable and precarious is the authority, or administration, that subfits by suppressing free discussion, by stilling the voice of truth, and extinguishing the light of fair ox These are the cowardly resources of a moment, unworthy, as they are weak; it is in vain to fly to the fliades of night for protection in error or injustice; truth will force herself on the minds of men; somer later the will be heard, and must prevail. To what perpose thould we reprobate in Great Britain the agitation of this great question, a question on which humanity has already decided? our filence and requestion on which humanity has already decided? our filence a ferve will not chain the feoret thoughts of the segra. The die is cast, the Britich have actually emancipated their flaves; their countryman fees them with arms in the pride of war, fighting in the cause of freedom: thus is the subject brought home to his door; it is forced on his observation, it is feelingly impressed, by the example of his neighbours, by the exhotrations that resound from illand to island. While we yet speak, perhaps the subject of these pages is become a vain speculation, and we have no islands in the West Indies to govern, no negrees to emancipate. We cannot suppose the negroes to be utterly void of feeling; they are, at present, held by the ties of fear alone. Feeble ties is a moment may dissolve them. They are, perhaps, ere this, dissolved. Heavy measures, you say, however humans in appearance, and plausible in theory, may produce the most calamitous of all contests; a bellum service which will probably never end, but in the extermination of either the whites or the blacks. Yet hasty measures seem to be sorted on us by the press of circumstances and the rapid emergency of the times; and if there is a danger of a bellum service from our results to adopt any in the pressure, much greater danger is there from our results to adopt any in the pressure, much greater danger is there from our results to adopt any in the pressure, much greater danger is there from our results to adopt any in the pressure.

1113111

I cannot perceive why an emancipation of the flaves, judiciously conducted, should involve both the flave and his owner in one common destruction; no such desafful consequences have ensued in these parts of America where the emancipation of the negroes has been adopted, no such desafful consequences are apprehended by the Dones from the emancipation of their agrees; and yet they enjoy the wifest government, perhaps (see the described), that modern times have stitutified. But, supposing that the sudden and complete emancipation of their agrees would be really attended with danger; or the entery and about, which such a measure would excite, should prove too loud and formidable for the legislature to encounter them; I am convinced there can be no fair and substantial objection to a present matigation, and to the progressive abolition of the distructive, cruel, and unchristian spiffern that now provails, by sotally and immediately prohibiting prohibiting the importation of flaves from Africa, and by diffusing partial freedom among the flaves already in the West Indies, in such a gentle and judicious manner as may prepare the whole body to expect the mighty bleffing in peaceful submission, and, at the same time, form and qualify them to enjoy it with sobriety and good order. Let those who have saithfully served their masters seven years; let the parents of three children born in marriage; let those who obtain certificates from the ministers of the Gospel of a proficiency in the knowledge of the christian religion, be manumitted; and let the children of segrees born in matrimony be declared free: such institutions would cheer these unfortunate people with a prospect of freedom, though partial and remote, and, at the same time would hold forth premiums for sobriety, good conduct, and submission to the laws.

But these evils we have reviewed, however deplorable, are without remedy; for the farms are already weak handed, and understocked. and the negro population decreases daily; and should the importation of flaves to supply the greedy fiream of vital confumption be prohibited, the same portion of labour, the same galling tasks, which are now with difficulty performed by twenty flaves, will fall to the share of, and be exacted (with the scourge no doubt) from seventeen. So abuse must engender abuse, and crueky must fanction crueky for ever, in a course of horrid reciprocation. But will it not be worthy of the magnanimity and justice of the legislature to cut this knot, if they cannot until it? May not this excessive cultivation beyond the honest means of the planter, and what humanity tolerates, be reftrained by law? and may not forme measures be devisted by the les gillature of GREAT BRITAIN, and enforced by the governments of the respective islands, to restrain the unrelenting and improvident avarice of the planter, thus prodigal of human life, and to proportion the quantity of labour to the ftrength of the labourers ?- But the immediate occupier or cultivator of the farm is often obliged, by contract, to remit a certain annual quantity of produce to the actual proprietor or bester send mortgagee, mortgages, in GRRAT BRITAIN, under whom he derives*.—Here is the rub—here we may find the true fource of most of the giant evils that overwhelm the miserable negroes, and the true cause why those evils are so clamorous and inveterate against all inquiry or cure.

The native planters who are born among their flaves, and many of them suckled at the breasts of their females, must feel their minds fostened in some degree towards them, and must learn insensibly to consider them as their fellow creatures, if not as their brethren; they are acquainted, from their childhood, with the manners of the negroes. their customs, their prejudices, and their propensities; and will know how to present to their minds the most powerful motives of cheerful exertion and voluntary labour, and they will take an interest in the perpetuity of their stock of saves. But a great proportion of the estates in the West Indies belong to inhabitants of Great Britain, who have never visited their plantations, and are wholly devoid of the requifites I have mentioned and which, appealing either to policy or humanity, might induce them to become merciful and indulgent masters. Their object is to draw the largest possible sevenue from their possesfions in the West Indies. They know no rule, but the compendious one of force; they are incapable of applying any motive or incentive of action but terror. Their plantations are committed to the care of penurious, griping, and fordid undertakers; of outcasts, perhaps, and felons; of agents equally narrow in their views, and favage and brutal in their dispositions; they sequire no other test of the abilities and good conduct of their managers, than the largeness and punctuality of their annual remittances. The condition of every effate which is the property of an absentee is usually wretched, and the peafantry belonging to it are in general oppreffed and wretched. But how lamentable must the case be, where the owner of the estate is an absentee, and the most part of the estate itself consists in a stock of human creatures, who look to the mercy and diference of a low ho agent, a hireling manager, not for opulance, peace, and comfort me but for their very existence?

Concerning the West India planters, you say no blame can justly the imputed to them, as they are entirely innocent and ignorant of manner in which the Save trade is conducted, and have no other cern therein than merely purchasing what British statutes have made objects of sale. Is this really the case? I cannot, with you, think the planters altogether ignorant, and therefore must not bold them a together innocent, of the manner in which the flave tra But if they close their ears against the remonstrances of the compassion; if they unite in a phalank to skille all inquiry into the condition of the negroes, all attempts to alleviate their sufferings, how can they be absolved at the bar of humanity? * But flavery (you " observe) has prevailed in all ages of the world, and perh " pain, poverty, fickness, forrow, and all the other various ca " of our condition, it has been originally in woven into the co " tion of the world for purpoles inscrutable to man +." This is a concife mode of putting an end to all inquiry, and of reconciling us to all abuses, by laying the faults of our own institutions, and the effects of our own follies, passions, and vices, to the charge of the Author of our nature, and of the dispensations of Providence.

Such are the reflections which have fuggested themselves to me from a perufal of your work; I offer them to the world, fuch as they are, with despondency. I can scarcely expect success in pleading the cause of humanity at a time when cruel sentiments and sanguinary rage prevail. How should the distant grouns of suffering argrees be no ticed, when the cries of devoted myriads at our very doors pails unheard? The human heart is steeled, the generation of the day retires from the fight and claims of mifery into a proud and fenfelefs apathy.

[•] Hift, of the West Indies, Vol. II.

Millions of our countrymen, of the most industrious and valuable part of the community, are perishing around us in all the horrors of famine and despair; yet do we stop see a moment the career of pleasure, or the march of ambition, to contemplate or commiserate the deplorable spectacle? Our brave soldiers, our artisans, and our merchants, are devoted, and shall the slave hope for redres? The free, the opulent, the enlightened, and the virtuous, are vilified and oppressed; and shall liberty be imparted? The liberties of Britain are invaded, and shall liberty be imparted to Africant? Proscriptions, accusations, divisions, distributions, difficulties, distress, dismay, and debts, prevail at home; danger, calamity, discomsture, and disgrace, abroad; and leave us little room for a care so trivial as that of the well or ill-being of half a million of soury Africant. Every hour, every moment brings on its wings—majestic Britain is in a new situation, all her energies called out to struggle for severish existence, and has she leisure to regulate the seeble concerns of remote colonies? Yet, even in these unhappy times, it is a proud and beneful consolution to the honest and philanthropic mind, that it has borne witness to the truth; a consolution which shall not defer it in the great and awful scene, where human injustice shall be redressed, and human sufferings be forgotten.

The state of the s

ne reconsignification of the acceptance of the a

The telepast scould have let in the

WILLIAM PRESTON.

Gloucefter Street, Dublin.

7 co. 10, 1795; Christian Lander Land

Charles Sit & Cold Company

